

Paula A. Michaels, PhD

Paula A. Michaels is currently an associate professor of history at Monash University (Melbourne, Australia), where she specialises in modern European history and the social history of medicine. She is a graduate of Northwestern University (BA) and the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill (MA, PhD). Michaels is the author of numerous articles and two prize-winning books: Curative Powers: Medicine and Empire in Stalin's Central Asia (2003) and Lamaze: An International History (2014). Support for her research has come from, among other organizations, the National Institutes of Health, National Endowment for the Humanities, John Simon Guggenheim Foundation, American Council of Learned Societies, and Social Science Research Council. She is co-editor of the forthcoming Paths to Parenthood: Emotions on the Journey through Pregnancy, Childbirth and Early Parenting (Palgrave Macmillan 2018) and is currently working on a book-length study on gender and trauma since World War II.